Not illustrated. 1808 Excerpt: .crown a landscape which boasts of a display of striking beauties. The deep recess of the northern shore betwixt Cowes and Ryde, whose banks are wooded to the very water's edge, has the spacious inlet called Fishbourne Creek, where the tide flows a considerable distance up the country, bordered on the eastern side by the beautiful wood of Firestone, which extends along nearly its whole course, and terminates its progress towards the high land that descends from Ashey Down. In one only part, where the road approaches Wootton-bridge, does the wood for a short space disappear, and this is adorned by the mansion of Kite-hill, the residence of Major Popham, and the scattered rural habitations of the village beneath. Passing the long causeway, under which the tide makes its way, and on its return works the considerable mill adjoining; the remainder of the village adorns the other hank, and the road ascends the long rise of Fern-hill, and passes close by its lofty tower. Such is the situation of the opposite neighbourhood; the estate of Fern-hill forms the other side of the picture; its plantations bordering the road, its grounds sloping along the margin of the expanded sheet of water, that appears a fine lake, backed by woods and lofty downs. In this situation the late Lord Bolton, governor of the island, erected this elegant mansion, but soon parted with it to the late possessor, Samuel Shute, Esq. not long deceased. During the minority of...
